Representations of motion-framed distance in spatial and temporal terms in the British National Corpus

1. Introduction
Knowledge of space on the horizontal plane is derived from motion in time. Consequently, spatial distance is often expressed as time, which makes space and time are interchangeable and intertwined in the context of motion. The ties that bind space and time together in motion are reflected in units of speed, e.g. the kilometer/mile per hour, or the largest unit of spatial magnitude, the light-year. In Talmy’s categorization of motion events the component of Motion refers to “the presence per se of motion or locatedness in the event”. Hence, the notion of motion event embraces both occurrence of translational motion, in which “an object’s basic location shifts from one point to another in space” and location, despite the fact the in the latter translational motion does not occur. Levinson points out that the description of translational motion is, at least to some extent, organized differently to the description of static locations because it involves an additional set of parameters that denote not only change of location, but also manner of motion, instrument of motion, as well as other attributes. This research demonstrates how frequently spatial and temporal representations of distance occur for the semantic attributes of manner and instrument of motion in the British National Corpus.

2. Methodology
This research employs the British National Corpus (henceforth, the BNC), which is a 100 million word collection of samples of written and spoken contemporary British English from a wide range of texts, genres, and registers (see www.natcorp.ox.ac.uk for more information). It examines motion-framed distance, which refers to a distance that separates one point from another in space in the semantic context of motion events. The scope of this report is restricted to examining representations of the motion-framed distance for two semantic aspects of manner and instrument of motion. It has long been recognized that instrument and manner are not easily disentangled. Instrumentality plays a fundamental role in processing semantic primes of actions, events, movement, and contact. Essentially, instrument and manner share common conceptual ground and participate in the action described by the verb simultaneously in a coordinate manner.

1 This report has been carried out within COST Action TD0904 “Time In MEntal ActivityY (TIMELY)” and supported with Polish National Science Centre grant No. 2011/01/M/HS2/03042 “Perception of Time as a Linguistic Category”

2 It was already pointed out by Aristotle in Physics (350BC) that all motion takes place in space and time: space is the potentiality, and time is the measure of motion.

The search for representations of the motion-framed distance in spatial and temporal terms was implemented by looking for frequencies of spatial and temporal adverbials. Adverbials examined in this study express absolute distance, i.e. one denoted in spatial, e.g. “4,348 kilometers across Australia”, or temporal units, e.g. “fifteen minutes from London”. Although the use of adverbials represents a fundamental way of denoting spatial extension, it is far from being exhaustive of the entirety of ways used for representing distance in language. However, the aim of this study is not to examine the full array of linguistic means available for denoting spatial extents, but to observe a general proportion between spatial and temporal expressions of distance in the context of motion events.

English as an S-language marks semantically the manner of motion in verb roots. The search for representations of motion-framed distance for the semantic aspect of motion manner was implemented by looking for distance expressions involving verbal roots. Eight verbs marking different manners of pedestrian motion, locomotion, aquamotion, and aeromotion were taken into consideration: cruis(e), driv(e), fly, march, rid(e), sail, tour, and walk. This selection is far from being exhaustive, since English has an enormous variety of motion verbs of manner. The search was implemented with the following lexical pattern:

QUANTIFIER + SPATIAL OR TEMPORAL UNIT + MOTION VERB ROOT + SPATIAL PREPOSITION; SLOP FACTOR=3, PRESERVE ORDER=NO

Because one cannot expect lexical items from the above lexical pattern to always follow directly one after another in everyday language, searching was implemented with proximity queries to afford for occurrence of additional modifiers between the query terms. Essentially, it allows for searching with a slop factor, which specifies how far apart lexical items included in a query can be from one another to be still returned as a result to the query. Moreover, it can be used in combination with a binary (yes/no) preserve order option, which indicates whether the original order of query terms should be preserved in results. For the purpose of this research, queries were implemented in a relaxed manner with the slop value of 3, and the preserve order option set to “no”.

To boost precision of proximity queries, quantifiers (cardinal numbers and determinatives used with countable nouns) were incorporated in the pattern. It was possible thanks to the part-of-speech annotation of the BNC, which marks cardinal numbers, spelled both in words and digits, with the <CRD> tag.\textsuperscript{13} The units of space measurement selected for analysis include both metric and imperial units typically used in the U.K., also in their American variants of spelling, i.e. kilometre (kilometer), metre (meter), mile, and yard. The units of time measurement selected for investigation include ones typically used to express duration of traveling, i.e. minutes, hours, and days. The adverbial pattern was finally specified with a set of fifteen prepositions conveying spatial relations: across, ahead, along, apart, away, behind, between, beyond, from, off, over, through, to, towards, within.

A similar procedure was implemented for the semantic aspect of motion instrument. The pattern was modified to include instead of verb roots prepositional phrases marking the instrument of motion. A selection of instruments was restricted to eight common means of private and public transportation, which are typically marked semantically in English with set prepositional phrases: by bike, by boat, by bus, by car, by coach, by plane / jet, by train, and on foot. This selection is far from being exhaustive and is dictated by availability of relevant examples in the corpus. For instance, the word plane yields only a single valid representation of distance from the BNC, therefore it was coupled with jet. The following lexical pattern was used in queries:

\textbf{QUANTIFIER + SPATIAL OR TEMPORAL UNIT + PREPOSITIONAL INSTRUMENTAL PHRASE; SLOP FACTOR=3, PRESERVE ORDER=NO}

The search was implemented in a similarly relaxed manner using proximity queries with the slop value of 3, and the preserve order option set to “no”. Again, quantifiers were employed to boost precision of proximity queries. Identical selections of space and time measurement units were used.

3. Queries

This research is based on the BNC World edition published in 2001. The corpus was searched with SlopeQ,\textsuperscript{14} a part-of-speech-sensitive concordancer with support for proximity queries. The number of returned results was set to the maximum of 10000 (available via “Paging” option). All queries were implemented with the value of 3 for SLOP factor\textsuperscript{15} (available via “Slop” option). The “Preserve order” option was set to “no”. A single asterisk () replaces any number of characters, e.g. [yard] substitutes for “yard, yards, yardstick, etc.” A vertical bar or pipe ( | ) symbol stands for logical AND, which enables executing multiple queries in a single line. For example, the query [by plane|jet] substitutes for two separate queries “by plane” and “by jet”.

The following queries were used:

\textbf{For the semantic aspect of motion manner}
